Learning the alphabet by interacting with each letter in many different physical ways helps students imprint and retain the letters and the letter sounds for easier recall when learning to read. Learning letters on a screen engages at most two physical channels: the eyes and the fingertips. It is not possible to tell one letter from another by the shape of the keys. Learning letters through writing them involves numerous tactile experiences, engaging the fine-motor muscles of the fingers and hand, and larger muscles of the arm and body, as well as the eyes. Make Handwriting Practice Fun Endeavor Young children are more apt to get excited about handwriting when you are excited, too. Keep the fussing out of handwriting and it will benefit your child tremendously! Here are some great tips on how to get your preschooler excited about handwriting. Practice, Practice, Practice! Let your children practice using different handwriting techniques. Here are some great tips on different ways your child can practice writing their name. And these 10 handwriting exercises will help keep your child excited about practicing while getting in some great fine motor skill practice! Let the Child Lead When it Comes to Handwriting Practice It's never a good idea to "force" your children to write. That can bring tears, frustration, and a whole lot of resentment. Instead let your children lead. If they show interest at a young age, great. If not, that's okay, too. As long as you are not pushing them too hard, they will all eventually want to write. You know your child best so watch for the signs. Practicing writing skills can be fun with the right tools! More Fun Ways to Develop Fine Motor Skills Because handwriting involves using the small muscles in your child's hand, it is a good idea to use fun activities to develop their fine motor skills. It's so neat to watch your child as they develop these skill and coordination. And it will help them do many things well in their lives for years to come! Below are 10 fun ways you can help your child develop the fine motor skills necessary for handwriting.
